CELEBRATING HISPANIC/LATINX HERITAGE MONTH

Jovita Idar was an organizer, writer, and advocate of Mexican-American women's rights. She grew up in Laredo, one of 8 children of parents who published La Crónica, a Spanish-language newspaper that exposed segregation, lynching, and other injustices endured by Mexican Texans in the early 20th Century. She trained to be a teacher, but frustration with her inability to improve her students' poor conditions propelled her to write for the newspaper and try to effect social change. In 1911, Idar and her family organized a conference in Laredo in support of unions, criminal justice, women's rights, and bilingual education. She founded La Liga Femenil Mexicanista, whose first project was to provide free instruction for poor Mexican children. She wrote for La Crónica and El Progreso, Spanish language newspapers that condemned violence against Mexican-Americans of South Texas. In 1913, during the Mexican Revolution, Idar traveled with revolutionary forces as a nurse. Later, when she wrote an editorial for the newspaper El Progreso protesting the presence of U.S. troops on the border. Famously, she stood in the newspaper's doorway to stop Texas Rangers from shutting it down. They eventually did, however, and Idar returned to run La Crónica after her father's death in 1914. In 1917, she moved to San Antonio where she started a free kindergarten and was active in the Democratic Party and the Methodist Church until her death in 1946.
