celebrating hispanic/latinx heritage month

In December 2016, Chicano Park was designated a National Historic Landmark, thanks to the efforts of U.S. Rep. Juan Vargas as well as Josephine Talamantez and Manny Galaviz of the Chicano Park Steering Committee. Located beneath Interstate 5 and the on-ramps for the San Diego-Coronado Bridge, the park was established in 1970 as a result of protests not long after construction of the bridge was completed. Today, it stakes the claim of holding the largest collection of outdoor murals in the world, with more than 100 of them painted on the freeway pillars, depicting messages and images of strength, struggle and community in Indigenous, Mexican and Mexican American history. In the early 1900s, Barrio Logan was part of a larger area known as Logan Heights. Its Mexican and Mexican American population grew as a result of immigration after the Mexican Revolution, as well as a development boom along the waterfront, which led to an increase in job and housing opportunities in the area. In 1963, the California Department of Transportation built Interstate 5 through Logan Heights, followed by the San Diego-Coronado Bridge construction four years later, effectively cutting the neighborhood in half. The northernmost part was called Logan Heights, with the southern part referred to as Barrio Logan. Thousands of residents, whose homes were in the construction's path, were forced to move. The attempted construction of a highway patrol station in the area in 1970 sparked an organizing effort by Barrio Logan residents and Chicano activists, who protested the development, occupying the park for 12 days until an agreement was reached between the community, state officials and the city of San Diego to support the creation of a community park.

Happy Hispanic
Heritage Month
