As a child, Ellen loved to read and her favorite subject in school was math. She excelled in school and won her county’s spelling bee at the age of 13. Ellen was also interested in music and started playing the flute when she was 10 years old. Ellen graduated from high school in 1975 and was her class valedictorian. Stanford University offered her a full scholarship because of her high grades, but she turned it down. Ellen wanted to stay close to her family and attended San Diego State University. Ellen wanted to study engineering in college, but since there were not many female engineers, professors encouraged her to study physics instead. Once again, Ellen excelled in school, and she was the valedictorian of her college class when she graduated in 1980. She went on to get her Master’s and Doctorate in engineering at Stanford University. NASA chose Ellen to join her first space mission on April 8, 1993. She and her four fellow crew members spent nine days on their mission aboard the space shuttle Discovery. The team researched the effects of the sun on the environment of Earth. As a mission specialist, Ellen had a specific job. She had to launch a satellite into space and then return it to the shuttle two days later. After her last trip to space in 2002, she continued to work for NASA, becoming the deputy director of the Johnson Space Center in 2007. Ellen was promoted to director of the center in 2013. She was the first Latinx director and the second woman to hold the position. In 2018, she left NASA to join the National Science Board, where she has served as its chair since 2020.
